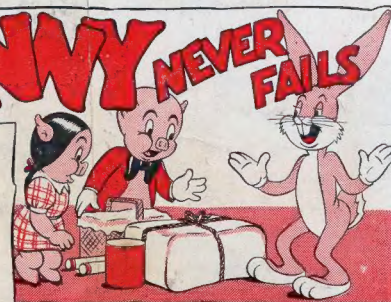
BUGS BUNNY NEVER FAILS



Petunia Pig looked at the large sheet of paper in her hand. It was a long list of camping supplies. Petunia and Porky Pig and Bugs Bunny were starting on a fishing trip the next day. They were going to camp overnight in the woods beside the stream.

"Now let's make sure that we all know exactly what we're to do," Petunia said seriously. "Porky will bring the sleeping bags and the fishing poles. Bugs will bring the tent and the bait. I'll bring the cooking utensils and the food."

"You can count on ol' Bugs for his stuff," Bugs chuckled, waving a half-eaten carrot.

"I'll b-be all s-set with m-my th-things," Porky promised.

"Fine!" Petunia nodded her approval. "Porky and I'll be at your house early in the morning, Bugs. Now we'd better all get busy!"

So the three separated. Bugs dashed toward his home. Porky and Petunia hurried down the street, talking eagerly as they went.

Petunia frowned with sudden anxiety. "I'm worried about Bugs," she said, after a moment's hesitation. "You know how he is, Porky. He usually forgets his promises or doesn't get around to doing his share. Then he spoils everything for us."

"Yes, I kn-know," Porky shook his head sadly. "R-Remember the ti-time he for-forgot to re-repair his b-boat and it almost s-sank under us?"

"So much depends on Bugs this time," Petunia went on. "We can't have a fishing trip without the tent and the bait. If he fails, all our plans will be completely ruined."

"Y-You're r-right," Porky agreed. "M-Maybe we'd b-better b-borrow Cicero's t-tent, just in c-case. And I'll d-dig an extra c-can of worms for b-bait."

"That's a good idea, Porky," Petunia told him with a sigh of relief.

They had just reached Petunia's front walk, so they said good-bye.

"I'll s-stop for you in the m-morning," Porky said, as he walked away. "Then w-we'll go on t-to Bugs's house."

Petunia spent the evening, packing her biggest lunch basket with goodies. Also she borrowed her little cousin Cicero's pup tent. Cicero was visiting at her house and he had luckily brought his tent with him.

Porky spent the evening, checking the hooks and lines and sinkers for his fishing poles. When they were in perfect order, he set them carefully on the back porch, in readiness for morning. He examined and rolled up the sleeping bags. And then he dug enough worms to fill a can, just in case the irresponsible Bugs should forget.

And what about Bugs? He spent the evening, tearing around his house like a whirlwind.

"Boy, oh boy!" he chortled happily as he worked. "I'll show Porky and Petunia this time. They think ol' B. Bunny can't be depended on. Well, they'll soon see they're wrong. Yessirree!"

On the living room floor was a brand-new tent, neatly folded, with a pile of tent stakes on top. Beside it stood two tin cans, one labeled, "Little Fish Bait," the other, "Whopper Bait."

When Bugs was satisfied that the tent and bait were in perfect order, he packed a big basket with bunches of golden carrots and all kinds of other good things to eat.

"I know that Petunia will bring a lotta good food," he told himself, "but I figure we're goin' to be workin' awful hard, haulin' in the fish, an' we'll be plenty hungry. 'Always be prepared' is the B. Bunny motto."

He added the filled basket to the pile on the living room floor. Then he stood for a moment in deep thought.

"I'd better take a couple of my own fishin' poles," he muttered. "Porky's poles aren't long enough to suit me."

So he added two fishing poles to the pile. Then, at last, Bugs trotted wearily off to bed.

The three fishermen scrambled eagerly out of their beds at dawn the next day.

When Porky went out on the porch to get his fishing poles, he discovered to his dismay that the neighbor's cat had been busy during the night, snarling up the fishing lines.

Porky tried and tried to untangle them, but he couldn't. At last, he gave up in despair. "We'll just have t-to b-buy some n-new s-string," he sighed.

So he loaded his poles, sleeping bags, and can of bait onto his coaster wagon and set out for Petunia's house.

When he arrived, he found that Petunia was having troubles, too. Little Cicero had decided to have a picnic of his own, since he couldn't go on the fishing trip. Before Petunia was awake, he had filled a big box with food from Petunia's lunch basket, and had slipped away from the house.

"Oh, dear," Petunia wailed. "I haven't time to fix more food now. I guess we'll just have to buy some."

Porky shook his head. He felt like wailing, too, but he didn't. Silently they added the almost-empty basket to the load on the wagon, and off they went to Bugs's house.

As they hurried down the street, Porky's can of bait toppled off the wagon and the worms scattered all over the street. Porky and Petunia didn't try to pick them up. They knew it would be useless.

Bugs Bunny was waiting for them at the front door. He looked at the loaded wagon and his long ears rose like question marks.

"I see you've brought your own tent," he said. "But how do you expect to put it up without tent stakes?"

Petunia was almost ready to cry. "We forgot the stakes," she groaned. "Everything is going wrong! We don't have any bait or fish lines or lunch or anything!"

"Don't worry, Petunia. Everything's under control," Bugs said with a triumphant grin. "Just follow me."

He led them into the living room and pointed proudly to the pile of equipment and supplies on the floor. "There!" he exclaimed. "Tent, AND tent stakes, lunch, bait, fishing poles and lines . . . everything!"

Porky and Petunia gasped with surprise.

"J-Jeepers!" Porky cried. "You've e-even g-got more s-stuff than you w-were s'posed to b-bring!"

"Yep!" Bugs laughed. "In the future always remember this: B. Bunny never fails!"
